I've owned a city notebook for each city I've lived in during the past five years. First was Stockholm, where I fell in love with the concept. It was a fantastic place to keep track of important places, notes, and even tasks. Then I moved to NYC and still found the notebook useful, even if there are some up and coming parts of the city missing in the maps, like most of Queens and Bushwick. Chicago has that issue, but much worst. Much of the west side, which is the kind of place people with moleskines like to be, is totally missing. Maybe tourists don't go to these places, but considering that they contain everything from Michelin-starred restaurants to important art gallerias, I think the omission is a bad choice.

I spent 3 months studying English in Chicago last year and decided to find the best city guide so I could enjoy the best things the city has to offer. I tried many of the well known guides and one of them (Fodor's) was my final choice. However, all guides are too focused on things for tourists and as I decided to be a Chicagoan for a few months, this city notebook was my main companion - I took notes, wrote addresses of great places I visited and used its maps a lot (the transparent pages are very useful to further customize your own map). Moleskine quality as its best. Highly recommended.

It's a satisfying and convenient size. Most of the notebook is blank pages, or sections that may be labelled however you wish, making it quite flexible. I especially like the detailed maps and the street guide. However, neither the maps nor the street guide for Chicago includes the grid system! Even if visitors may not take the time, nor really need, to understand the numbering system, the city guides seem like they are as much geared toward residents as tourists.

I have yet to log anything in this notebook but I am very excited to start! In the past 3 years I have lived in Norfolk, Kansas City, and Chicago and I don't really have anything to show for it! I can't wait to create a personalized travel guide to use and pass on to my friends and family who visit

I go to DePaul in the city and it has been the most useful guide. I love how I can write down my favorite restaurants and places I like to go. Whenever my friends comeback from colleges out of state, I have a reference to show them the cool places where I party and stuff. I also like the maps in there too; Especially the CTA!

Chicago's my fave city and my 2nd hometown, carrying it makes me feel like have a piece of Chi inside my pocket!!

Got this for our first family trip to Chicago, not only was it accurate and full of good information, it has a spot in the back to write about our adventures.

This is a great product. When my husband and I go on vacation to a large city, we always purchase a coordinating Moleskine because of the awesome maps & guides.
